Michelle says...

November is such a great month—beautiful colors everywhere and smell of fall in the air! I hope everyone enjoys the holiday and spending time with family and friends. It's still a great time to buy that new home and be in for the holiday season. Rates are at records lows so you get even more bang for your buck! Most importantly, remember your Realtor when you are baking all of those goodies! YUMMY!

Tip of the month . . .

New homes typically have a higher sales price than comparable existing homes, and buyers are usually willing to spend more on a new home because of lower maintenance costs. Builders' warranties on new homes, along with a new roof, appliances, and major systems, usually make major repairs unnecessary and help to counter a slower initial rate of appreciation. A 1991 Census Bureau Housing Survey suggests that operating costs are lowest for brand new homes, slightly higher for relatively new existing homes, but lower on average for older existing homes. Operating costs per square foot of living space, however, are consistently higher for progressively older existing homes. Utility costs represent the largest factor in operating costs. Energy consumption per square foot depends on the size of the home, the insulation and quality of the windows, air leakage and the efficiency of the furnace.
